

The children of cross-cultural workers need to be educated but they often live in places where education is less accessible.

Schools have been set up in Africa, Asia, the Pacific Islands and Europe to cater for MKs (Missionary Kids). See schools listed overleaf.

When teachers leave their home countries to come and help meet the educational needs of our kids it is a huge blessing to us and allows us to confidently continue with the work that God has called us to do.

UKARUMPA INTERNATIONAL SCHOOL PARENT

Teaching MKs - Helen Sahl

In 1998, my husband and I went to Papua New Guinea with Wycliffe Australia as school teachers. We taught the children of people who were involved in many ways in the Bible translation movement. There were over 200 MKs at Ukarumpa International School as well as children of Papua New Guinean staff. We went for two years but stayed for twenty, raising our own four kids there and loving the opportunity to be a part of the Bible translation task in PNG.

I'm on my way - Talitha Follent

I am a qualified teacher and have also completed my training for cross-cultural ministry. Now I am building a prayer and financial support team to get behind me as I go to Papua New Guinea. I'll be teaching at the primary campus but there are needs also for the secondary campus. I have had a passion for mission for most of my life and am excited that I can use my teaching skills to help advance Bible translation. Papua New Guinea has over 800 languages and people from those languages are asking for help in translating the Scriptures.

How could a teacher help with Bible translation?

Rain Forest International School - CAMEROON

There aren't many education options for children of missionaries in West Africa. If the school didn't exist many families involved in Bible translation would have to leave the work for the sake of their children's education.

Allison, a teacher at RFIS, observed:

'It's huge for families. They are relieved ... We have parents who are doctors, pilots, translators, construction workers, church planters, or who run discipleship programs, seminaries or Bible schools. We enable all those ministries to go on.'

'Teachers here provide an uplifting, encouraging atmosphere along with high standards of education. It's not just a teaching job, it's a lifestyle that the kids observe and a critical role that enables Bible translators and literacy workers to succeed at their tasks.' - UIS PARENT

Bible translation is needed so that people can have the Scriptures in a language they can understand.
